tion of Federal sentencing guidelines. The study consists of three major components: (1) an analysis of the determinants of sentence severity; (2) an analysis of the effects of sentencing on individual behavior; and (3) surveys of judges and other selected populations.

A federally financed study ("Victimless Crimes: A Description of Offenders and Their Prosecution in the District of Columbia," conducted by the Institute for Law and Social Research) suggests that law enforcement should consider whether the money and manpower used to pursue certain "victimless" crimes is well spent. The study, based on Washington, D.C., arrest records, said 21 percent of all persons appearing in the city's Superior Court in the first 6 months of 1976 were accused of so-called victimless crimes. About half were acquitted. Of those convicted, 83.8 percent never went to jail. Of those who did, less than 3 percent spent a year or more there. "In setting law enforcement policies, decisionmakers should be aware that the resources involved in enforcing victimless crimes are high compared to the resources used in crimes involving victims," the study said. The report covered gambling, prostitution and marihuana-related offenses.

Sessions of the national "Criminality Colloquium" were held September 20 to 23 in Indianapolis, and were sponsored by the Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar Association, the Criminal Justice Program of the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies, and the Indiana Lawyers Commission. The 40 experts assembled to exchange views included judges, criminologists, law professors, psychologists, correction commissioners, prosecutors, and other specialists.
